Jute Works sikas

This range of sikas and terracotta planters is from the Jute Works, Bangladesh. When Shared Earth opened as a small shop in York in 1986, it was full of these sikas – now, they're coming back into fashion again.

Bangladesh is one of the poorest countries in the world and is badly threatened by global warming as the seas rise. The Jute Works, founded in 1973, is one of the oldest Fair Trade organisations in the world and we're proud to support them. Natural, local raw materials are used throughout. Most of the artisans are women in rural or slum areas.

Cut coconut bowls

Coconut milk is key to much Balinese cooking ... which leaves a huge mountain of empty coconuts.

Fortunately, Bali is packed with creative artists who put their skills to good use producing this dizzying array of decorative bowls that can be used in a wide variety of ways. A wonderful use of a waste product.

Bamboo windchimes

Bamboo is easily renewable and can play an important part in tackling climate change. As a raw material it is excellent both for environmental and economic sustainability in rural areas. It takes up little space, grows to maturity in under 5 years, and can be harvested regularly. For products like these chimes, it's ideal, as it grows freely in the woods and empty spaces close to our producer's workshop. This is in a village near Ubud, Bali; they already live a sustainable lifestyle, growing their rice and other crops close by, and the sale of windchimes allows them to maintain the long-term sustainability of their community.

Paper mobiles

The popular mobiles on this page are handmade in Thailand using traditional techniques. The raw material for 'saa' paper, comes from the bark of the Mulberry tree, which is fast growing and commonly found in Southeast Asia.

Every year, the bark peels off, so it's a totally sustainable material; if not used, it would simply go to waste.

Wooden stools

These animal stools and the table are just perfect for a special children's party! And the stools on the following pages couldn't do a better job at making young children feel special. They're sturdy so they won't tip over all the time, and even if they do... well it's hardly any distance from the floor.

The wood is sourced from the Samanea Saman or 'Raintree' (Acaccia or 'Monkey Pod tree') and can be recognised by its characteristically umbrella shaped canopy. Often planted by roads to give shade, it grows so quickly that it's a perfect eco friendly hardwood for furniture production.

Dreamcatchers are a Native American Indian tradition, supposed to protect you from bad dreams, whilst letting the good dreams through; they're supposed to slip through the hole in the centre, and glide down the feathers to the sleeping person below.

Ours are made in Bali, and our purchases keep several families in work each year. That was especially helpful during Covid, when sales to tourists dried up completely.

Catch your dreams!
