Climate Justice

The people most affected by climate change – droughts, floods, unusual weather etc – are generally not the ones responsible for causing it. It's caused by the lifestyles of those in the richest countries – but it disproportionately affects those in less developed countries, who can afford it least. Countries with money and resources can adapt more easily; the challenges of climate change are hitting the impoverished countries of the South far harder than countries like the UK. Millions of people are losing their lives, often their houses and livelihoods; the number of 'climate refugees' is increasing all the time. That's why the Climate Justice movement, and Fair Trade, are so important – giving the people who suffer most at least some chance to cope in the face of disaster.

Nearly half the UK's carbon emissions are associated with the goods we buy and sell. But trade was not covered in the Paris agreement or COP26; it's not counted in our net zero targets, or our international climate commitments. Is this really true?? Are politicians burying their heads in the sand; or is the pressure from big business to make profits behind this, ignoring what happens to future generations? What can we do, as small businesses, to tackle climate change and create a fairer, more sustainable world?

We can't change government policy just like that. But we can set an example! Consumers have power, we elect our leaders and they are responding to our growing concern that things have to change. The successful businesses of tomorrow will be the ones which change today – buying and selling sustainable products. We need to make it clear to our customers – most of whom will support us, and more will come to us as a result – that we are playing our part in this growing movement for a sustainable world. Future generations will look back on those who don't, if they remember them at all, as the dinosaurs of an ancient world.
