Paper mobiles

The popular mobiles on this page are handmade in Thailand using traditional techniques. The raw material for 'saa' paper, comes from the bark of the Mulberry tree, which is fast growing and commonly found in Southeast Asia.

Every year, the bark peels off, so it's a totally renewable/sustainable material; otherwise it would simply go to waste.

Bamboo windchimes

Bamboo is an easily renewable grass which can play an important part in tackling climate change. As a raw material it is excellent both for environmental and economic sustainability in rural areas. It takes up little space, grows to maturity in under 5 years, and can be harvested regularly. For products like these chimes, it's ideal, as it grows freely in the woods and empty spaces close to our producer's workshop. This is in a village near Ubud, Bali; they already live a sustainable lifestyle, growing their rice and other crops close by, and the sale of windchimes allows them to maintain the long-term sustainability of their community.

The giant panda's diet is almost exclusively bamboo. It lives in remote regions of central China, and is an iconic story of conservation success; it has now been taken off the endangered species list. It remains extremely rare however, and it could still be left hungry and struggling to survive by global warming, which may wipe out much of its natural habitat. The bamboo forests are also threatened by increasing human encroachment, as land is taken over for agriculture. This mobile, made in Bali, opens out into a spiral and circles round with just a small breath of wind.

Bamboo windchimes

Bamboo chimes are great in the garden where they make a mild, muted resonant sound which seems more natural and less intrusive than metal chimes – it can be deeply soothing in fact and not at all annoying as some chimes can be.

Cut coconut bowls

Coconut milk is key to much Balinese cooking ... which leaves a huge mountain of empty coconuts.

Fortunately, Bali is packed with creative artists who put their skills to good use producing this dizzying array of decorative bowls that can be used in a wide variety of ways. A wonderful repurposing use of a waste product.

NEW RANGE

Jute works sikas

We're delighted to present this new range of sikas and terracotta planters from the Jute Works, Bangladesh. When Shared Earth opened as a small shop in York in 1986, it was full of these sikas – now, they're coming back into fashion again.

Bangladesh is one of the poorest countries in the world and is badly threatened by global warming as the seas rise. The Jute Works, founded in 1973, is one of the oldest Fair Trade organisations in the world and we're proud to support them. Natural, local raw materials are used throughout. Most of the artisans are women in rural or slum areas.

Balinese macramé

Macramé is all about knots. There is evidence of macramé existing over 2500 years ago, on carvings of the Babylonians and Assyrians. In more recent times sailors have produced macramé crafts of many sorts, either for use on ships or as decorative craft pieces. Macramé was hugely popular in the Victorian era when it was used on all sorts of household objects: curtains, tablecloths, bedspreads, and even clothes!

The Fair Trade macramé work we present here is produced by artisans in Bali and Java. From the smallest hanging plant basket to the large decorative shelving unit the craftsmanship is impressive and beautiful.

Wooden stools

These animal stools and the table are just perfect for a special children's party! And the stools on the following pages couldn't do a better job at making young children feel special. They're sturdy so they won't tip over all the time, and even if they do... well it's hardly any distance from the floor.

The wood is sourced from the Samanea Saman or 'Raintree' (Acaccia or 'Monkey Pod tree') and can be recognised by its characteristically umbrella shaped canopy. Often planted by roads to give shade, it grows so quickly that it's a perfect eco friendly hardwood for furniture production.

All the stools here are 24cm high
